Abstract

The legacy of the Second World War in Asia and the Pacific is an enduring one. Increasingly, cultural heritage and tourism serve as the touchstones by which current generations engage with the experience and memory of war and peace. The idea of contested memory provides one way of explaining interpretations of the past and management of heritage sites in the present day. While history is a discipline that studies the past, heritage is the constructed depiction of the past in the present day and tourism often serves the vehicle that drives popular memories of war and more practical concerns such as site visitation and, for some areas, regional development. This is equally true for Pacific Island states as it is for continental Asia. While they are often spoken of as having an intellectual commonality in terms of their concern with understanding the past history, heritage and tourism are all often deployed for political purposes and directly influence the ways that communities and, for that matter, nation states remember the past.
